

"Small change, big difference"

Self-portrait, which carries question. Often small things play an important role in our lives, and not so often we think about them. Another interesting fact is that if you take a certain object and look at it from another angle, its essence and meaning changes. This object, strictly speaking, it may be a moment or an act. It is not necessary to give examples, and without this it is clear that a certain action can change situation and then the sense of the situation. If you turn the work "Small change, big difference" upside-down, you will see in it an entirely different meaning. First you see a fetal position. Turn the work and it's despair. So why do we think about our actions so rarely?
