The secret of moving up the pyramid of wealth

I arrived here half a year ago. I liked this apartment from the first moment. Now in my room I have things scattered around and among them quietly rests a small white IKEA table. On it stands a glass vase of red roses. I remember someone told me that all roses originate in deserts of middle east.

My flatmate works in a refugee camp. She's religiously devoted to her work and to her new boyfriend from Iran. They are a beautiful couple. They share many similarities. Both speak of socialist paradise on earth and curse current capitalist government. They both drink Che Guevara cola and smoke cigarettes imported from India that smell like incense from a royal palace. In our conversations I don't say much, just listen and sometimes ask circular questions. I want to believe that somehow I am not completely captured by spontaneously ideological attitude to with my life. I have time to think about it.

Five days a week I wake up early and start preparing for work. At 9 a.m. I am at a hotel in a city center. Here I clean bathrooms and make beds for seven hours straight. I need money to sustain myself. The hotel - its manager and guest needs me to sustain their plan for life.

After work I feel completely exhausted and serenely empty minded.

The secret of attaining one-pointed mind

When walking, only walk. When sitting, only sit. When watching TV, only watch. When eating kebab, only eat. When feeding your dog, only feed dog. When dreaming about your vacations, only dream. When not telling what's on your mind, only don't tell. When caressing your child's hair, only caress. When remembering your old lover, only remember. When shopping for new shower-gel, only shop. When seeing your naked body reflected in the mirror, only see. When trying to find meaning, only try. When doing the right thing. Just do it.
